The Importance of Disposition

Lightening is a common phenomenon during thunderstorms, around the world. It is often perceived as destructive due to the loud thunderous noise accompanied by a massive release of electrical energy which can be fatal to living organisms. This mammoth surge of energy, upon direct contact, disintegrates living tissue since nature has not designed living organisms to safely channel this quantum of energy. While this might be true, certain mushroom/ fungi spores are able to use the energy in the lightning for an induced growth spurt. A fungi that suffers a direct hit from a lightning strike will be destroyed and will transfer the energy into the soil. As the electrical charge is grounded, it weakens as it travels through the soil. This weakened charge catalyses the growth of fungi spores by encouraging the growth of proteins and enzymes in them.

This inherent characteristic of fungi, which enables it to channel this energy and utilise its vital force to create life is an excellent example of the unique disposition of an individual organism and its importance. It is due to the inherent unique disposition of the fungi species, hardcoded into its genetic blueprint, the fungi is able to thrive, by utilising a force of nature, which is otherwise absolutely destructive to other life forms.

This explains the disposition of the specific species of mushroom that is intrinsic to its genetic code. As understood from the aforementioned example, every individual has a particular disposition, which is intrinsic to its genetic code. No two individuals are ever alike. Every living organism is unique with distinct dispositions. Hence, it is important to understand the basic nature/ disposition of every individual in order to ascertain the corresponding remedy. This will ultimately enable us to cure the individual successfully and non violently, by restoring the balance and flow of vital energy that flows through the individual patient.
